McClelland Barclay, 1943

Edward Kalbfus (1877-1954) was a staunch believer in the value of the Naval War College to the service. He exerted strenuous efforts to forward the institution's objects and to enhance its stature within the Navy Department as well as in Newport, which names the main street leading from town to the College as Admiral Kalbfus Road. He graduated from the College in 1927, served two years on the staff and served two separate tours as president. On leaving the College as the twenty-second president, he was promoted in 1938 to four stars as Commander Battle Force, United States Fleet. On reassignment as the twenty-fourth president of the Naval War College, he reverted to his permanent rank as a rear admiral. He is best remembered for the College's production of Sound Military Decision (1942), the only published guide for naval planning in the Navy, and for the successful efforts that he made to keep the College open during the Second World War.

After leaving the War College in 1942, he served on the Navy's General Board and later as the first Director of Naval History. In 1944, he was a member of the three-officer Pearl Harbor Court of Enquiry.
